

How to deliver successful
cross border carve-outs

Why people and legal entities are the costliest parts of carve-outs

With many companies divesting parts of their portfolios, and so many willing buyers, carving out assets from a company's portfolio has been a successful strategy for many, reaping significant rewards.

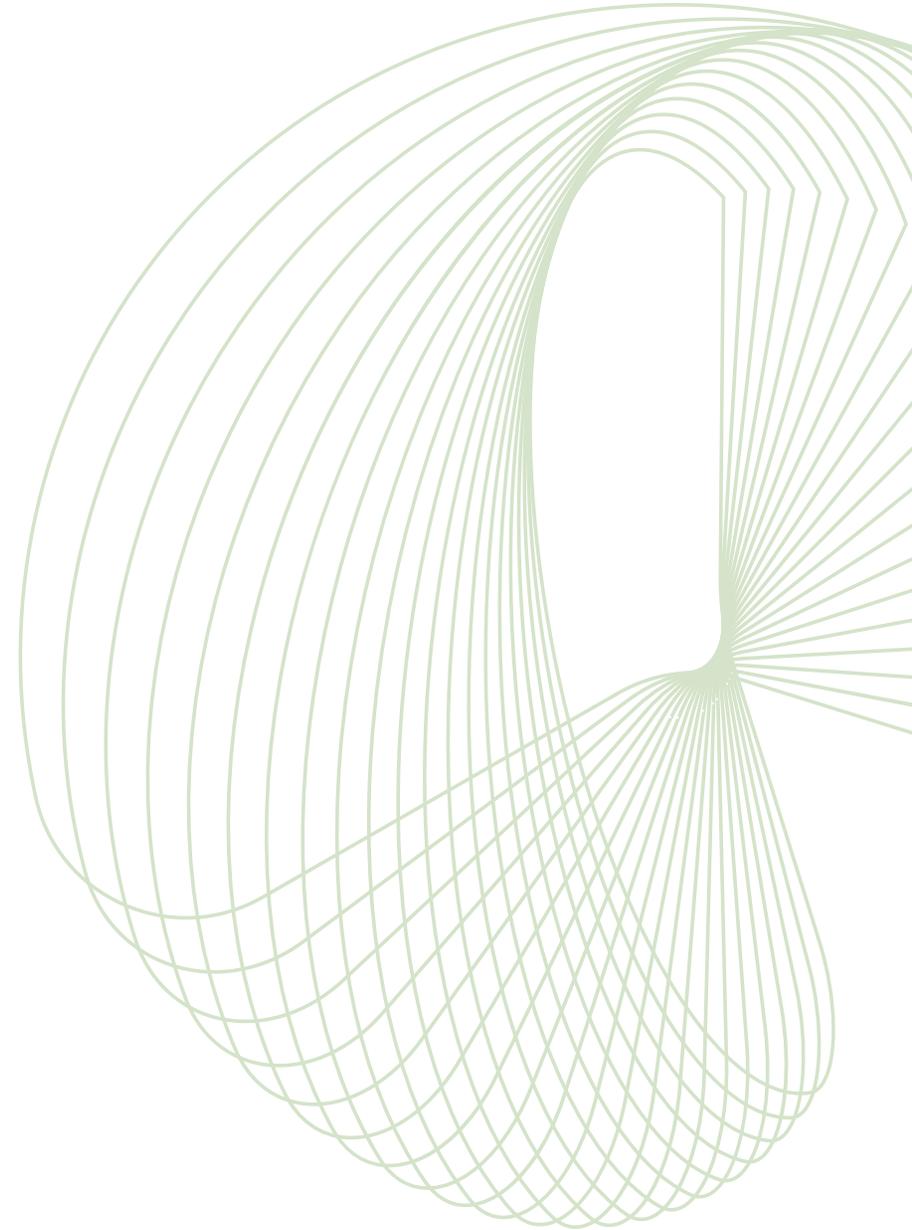

However, in today's world, while getting the best bang for your buck is important, the highest bid is not always the winning one.

For many sellers, the need for speed is fast becoming one of the most significant decision-making factors, so they can focus solely on their retained business. And, for buyers, every day adds costs and frustration, particularly if there is a Transition Services Agreement ('TSA') in place.

Carve-outs, especially cross-border ones, remain notoriously difficult to execute. Coordinating multiple providers, jurisdictions, and stakeholders requires more than just legal expertise, it demands operational discipline and global infrastructure

Despite this awareness, the time to complete carve-outs is still taking far too much time and, therefore, money – and even more so when the carve-out includes people and/or entities overseas.

HSP Group, a company that specializes in global expansion shares insights on ways to execute a successful cross-border carve-out.

Understanding dependencies is critical

Acquiring part or whole of a business, especially an international business, can be a seriously complex undertaking. Inconsistent, local regulations and ambiguous, and often convoluted, employment laws make it hard for a non-specialist to make sense of what needs to be done. There are often a significant number of dependencies, dictated by local compliance, which makes a transaction complicated. Knowing what to prioritize and having the skill set to deliver is challenging.

“Extracting international subsidiaries from their parent companies is fraught with red tape and risk. This is in part due to the inconsistent local regulations and employment laws when human capital is caught up in the transfer. Both the Seller and the Buyer will need to be aware of the legal and operational requirements, and the timelines to achieve them.”

states Michele Museyri, Director, HSP Group.

As a result, a raft of specialists who focus on carve-outs have evolved. These players are experts in compliance tasks, rules and regulations, as well as decreasing the risks associated with cross-border transactions. They do it day in and day out, and some do it across all continents, making their knowledge and expertise invaluable. The key is understanding the implications of both the legal and operational requirements – and importantly the timelines of activities.

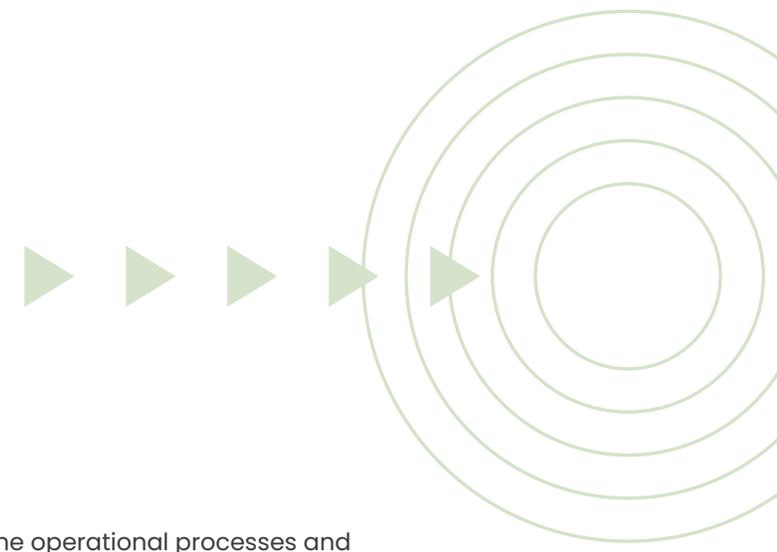

■ Did you know?

Setting up the entities and registrations is not always simple and can lead to regulatory delays. In addition, deadlines can be significantly impacted by the time taken to obtain the necessary licenses, open bank accounts and set up payroll.

In countries such as India and Singapore, local entities are required to have a resident director. This means the local subsidiary must appoint at least one director who is a resident of the country, i.e. a citizen or a permanent resident.

Whereas in France, a fiscal tax representative must be appointed. These individuals are directly liable for the taxpayer's VAT liabilities. Registrations are necessary and the entity must appoint one to two local representatives who speak the language to communicate and coordinate with the local authorities regarding all matters related to tax, compliance, social insurance, etc. In many instances, tax filings become due during the set-up process and companies must be aware of the filing deadlines and prepared to complete and submit them to avoid fines, penalties and reputational damage. These can all happen within days, weeks or even months of the deal being signed.

Transition Service Agreements (TSA) may be the answer

For many buyers, a TSA with the seller smooths the way for a successful migration.

The main objective of a TSA is to maintain business continuity whilst the buyer works through the operational processes and integration challenges that come with bolting on new business. It de-risks the migration and buyers can have confidence that the new business will continue to operate productively while it is transitioned across to their company.

Most TSAs focus on managing HR, payroll, benefits and other mandates, such as IT platforms, for a set period of time after closing. They run from financial close (Day 1) to the full separation (Day 2). On Day 1 the new company owns the carved out business but the seller maintains responsibility for some of the critical support services. By Day 2, the buyer has migrated all works onto their platforms and the seller has severed all ties.

It is, therefore, important for the TSA to be well thought through, realistic and completed within the timeframe stipulated. An ineptly designed, poorly delivered or over-running TSA, is often bad news for both parties. The buyer might have to extend the TSA, and remain locked in at considerable cost, and the seller cannot focus solely on their core business.

Setting up entities can take time

For many carve-outs, setting up new entities is the norm.

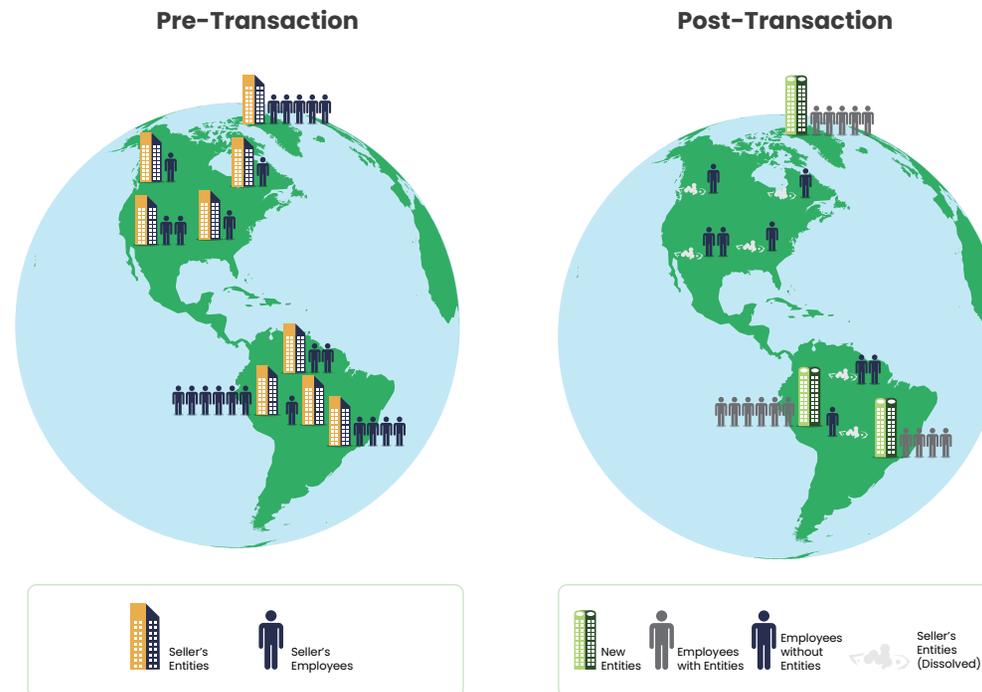

Often the buyer will need to set up an entity in an existing or new country for compliance reasons. There can be challenges around timelines with this, as setting up an entity can take weeks or months, depending on which jurisdictions are involved. Knowing what you can do and how to do it swiftly is advantageous.

In addition, in many countries, sorting out banking can take longer than expected, particularly with increasing Know Your Customer (KYC) regulations across the globe. And, in some cases, without a bank account, establishing an entity is impossible, creating further delays.

After incorporation, additional registrations will be required and tax liabilities, payroll administration, HR management, statutory bookkeeping and other administrative tasks will become required.

Having the systems and knowledge to administer this immediately and accurately will make the difference between moving ahead smoothly or falling into a whole raft of legal and compliance headaches.

Employer of Record (Eor) could be a strategic solution for countries with low employee headcounts

It may be that some locations have just a few employees and no real revenue generating or high-risk activity. In these cases, buyers may want to consider an EoR. This can be a short-term or long-term solution depending on the location, number of employees and the company's strategy.

Regardless of whether the longer-term plan is to set up an entity in location, starting with EoR is certainly a quick way to ensure payroll checks are executed successfully to employees worldwide. However, it is important to be aware of the requirements and potential challenges associated with utilizing EoR as an employment solution in a transaction scenario.

Employment legislation can have transfer liabilities

As part of the deal's due diligence process, companies should check if the target country's laws protect employees when a business is transferred.

In Europe, the European Commission's Acquired Rights Directive (ARD) impacts all EU member states and is aimed at protecting an employee's rights in transfers of undertakings, business or parts of business to another employer. At the core of this is ensuring that affected employees maintain their terms and conditions of employment, and that the rights and obligations of an employment contract or relationship are transferred to the new employer. There are also requirements related to informing and consulting employees. As a result, it may not be possible to terminate employees following the transfer where ARD applies. This could have serious financial implications for the buyer if this was a route under consideration.

In addition, consideration should be given to other transfer liabilities such as salaries, pensions, accrued vacation, bonuses and other contractual employee benefits, which may need to equal the seller's terms. Employees' employment-related liabilities will need to be reviewed one by one and compared against the one being proposed to ensure that overall the employee is left no worse off economically than he/she was prior to the transfer.

Another obligation could arise if transferred employees are covered by a Collective Bargaining Agreement (CBA). Collective bargaining is the process of negotiating the employment terms between an employer and a group of workers. The process takes place between company management and a labor union. It often covers a multitude of subjects, such as salary, overtime, benefits and working conditions. The employee rights under a CBA will add another layer of employer complexity for the buyer, especially if it is mandatory. As a CBA regulates additional terms and conditions of employment, it is often at least a year before any changes take place, depending on the country.

Finding the right partner is critical

It's clear that while carve-outs can be extremely lucrative, they take a lot of thought and due diligence, as well as a raft of skills and knowledge that often requires external expertise for the buyer. Finding the right combination of solutions to meet goals can be challenging.

As described in this article, when it comes to employment of staff, EoR in certain circumstances may be an excellent option, particularly if there is a TSA in place with deadlines. In other cases, it will make more sense to set up an entity straight away. Discussing the business strategy and goals with experts will determine the best course of action.

Whichever route is deemed appropriate, bringing in specialists as early as possible can save the new owner money, time and, more importantly, ensure compliance with local rules.

For deals involving different countries, the argument for experts is even stronger. Time zones, as well as multiple rules and regulations with different timelines and expectations, can present huge ramifications for deal completion times and success. Front-line technical expertise and bespoke solutioning is required. Having access to specific in-country knowledge and skills may be one of the best investments the acquirer can make, as a deep understanding of local laws, local government, local employment practice may make the difference between a successful carve-out and one that eats up management time and budgets.
